Miss Margaret Mather, who is now a wife, and equally a mother, was seen in the city last week with her nice, new chubby-hubby. Herr Pabst. The exactress looked exceedingly dapper, with a sort of subdued and unstagely dapperness, but she was not in the haunts of the theatrical folk, and it is not likely that she will take to the stage again. The theatrical agents, who know it all, or fancy they do, declare that rhe will never act again. Those who are inclined to feel tearful as they read this must reflect that what the stage loses sweet domesticity has gained.

domesticity has gained.

The perpetually arch young worgan known as Laura Burt is in England, where she has been visiting the "In Old Kentucky" company. Miss Burt is engaged to play the leading role in that fervent melodrama next season in this country. She was very much pleased with the English producton. It wasn't quite as good as that seen at the Academy of Music, but much better than she expected. "In Old Kentucky" has not caught the English fancy to any very stupendous extent. Its most interesting feature seems to be the colored people who parade the streets of the provincial towns and startle the natives.
